The Treatment Family Care Services Act

The bipartisan Treatment Family Care Services Act introduced by Senator Tammy Baldwin (D-WI) and Senator Rob Portman (R-OH) will improve home-based health and mental health services for thousands of America's most vulnerable youth. This bill clarifies Medicaid policy that affects children, including foster children, with special behavioral health needs and/or medical disabilities as well as children living with kinship and biological caregivers.

Background on the *Treatment Family Care Services Act

Treatment Family Care (often referred to as "Treatment /Therapeutic Foster Care" or TFC) is the evidence-informed, trauma-informed, and highly effective intervention children and youth with serious medical, psychological, emotional and social needs. In TFC care, foster parents as well as other parents and caregivers are given special training to address the needs of youths with major mental health challenges and children receive intensive in-home services to sustain them in the community. Kinship and biological families also receive TFC training and support to care for their youth to help avoid out-of-home care, support kinship placements and sustain strong family homes.

TFC provides critical services to approximately 46,000 or 1-in-10 foster children across the country.<sup>1</sup> The intervention works to keep particularly vulnerable youth out of costly and sometimes ineffective residential and congregate care. In addition, it provides needed clinical therapy options to youth in lieu of overmedication.

Despite the clear benefits of TFC, current law does not provide for a standard definition of TFC benefits under Medicaid. Though TFC services are provided across the country—and are reimbursed through Medicaid and other child welfare funding streams—the lack of a federal standard impairs TFC quality and access.<sup>2</sup>

The Treatment Family Care Services Act addresses this problem by requiring the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services and the Administration for Children and Families to provide states with clear guidance on federal TFC standards under the Medicaid program and other available federal funding streams. This commonsense clarification will promote accountability for states offering TFC, delineate appropriate TFC services for reimbursement, and drive personnel training and standards.

The legislation is endorsed by a significant number of national children's and mental health organizations, including: The Foster Family-based Treatment Association, Generations United, Child Welfare League of America, the Alliance for Strong Families and Communities, Voice for Adoption, National Foster Parent Association, and Dave Thomas Foundation for Adoption, Juvenile Law Center, and Youth Villages.

Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-CT), Rep. Tom Cole (R-OK), and Rep. Karen Bass (D-CA) are leading bipartisan companion legislation in the House of Representatives.

<sup>2</sup> A 2013 independent study from Boston University found that that all 50 states and the District of Columbia offer intensive therapeutic services of some level to foster youth with serious behavioral and/or mental health disorders under various names. The University's research showed that states currently use Medicaid reimbursement to pay for the clinical services associated with these youth's care regardless of the particular name of their state program. Its research also uncovered a significant level of confusion and lack of clarity about TFC across states (as well as within states) and in the broader child welfare field. The University concluded that a critical first step to eliminating the confusion about TFC, and bringing greater clarity to the child welfare field, is the adoption of a federal standard.
